

JUVENILE OFFENDER RE-ENTRY STUDY PLAN

Study Mandate

Direct the Commission on Youth to study juvenile offender re-entry in Virginia and report findings and recommendations to the Commission prior to the 2011 General Assembly Session.

Identified Issues

- The majority of juveniles entering Virginia's juvenile justice system have complex needs, including mental health and substance abuse, and are frequently involved in multiple service systems, including child welfare, special education, mental health and juvenile justice.
- In Fiscal Year 2009, the Department of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) received 85,578 intake complaints, 16,626 new probation cases and 17,202 pre-dispositional placements. In addition, 2,677 juveniles were committed to DJJ.
- Virginia spends over $100,000 per year to incarcerate one youth in a juvenile correctional center.
- Of the juveniles committed to DJJ, 65% have a diagnosed mental health disorder. Over half of the juveniles admitted also have a history of prescription psychotropic medication use.
- There are challenges posed by these juveniles as they are returned to their communities. The primary goal of successful community reintegration is for the juvenile to begin building a foundation for a successful and productive future for and to not reoffend.
- In 2007, at 12-months, 41.5% of juveniles released by DJJ from a juvenile correction center and slightly over 26% of juveniles placed on probation recidivated. (DJJ defines a juvenile recidivist as a juvenile who is found by a court to have committed, after being placed on probation or released from confinement, a delinquent or criminal act other than violation of probation or parole.) In addition, 27% of these juveniles were reincarcerated.
